

Livelihood at the Brahmaputra

It was summer morning that I happened to visit the Uzan Bazar fish market (Guwahati) on the shores of the Brahmaputra. On one side were the fisherman who were pulling out their catch and there were others who were buying the fresh catch. I happened to see another set of people who were loading their cycles with variety of fishes to sell across the city presumably. This cycle caught my attention, just overlooking the Brahmaputra and it made me realize how the river continued to be a livelihood for the fishermen, the sellers and of course the transporters across the city.

Heavenly Pathway

I clicked this picture while taking a walking in a park built along the bank of the river Bhramaputra. I happened to pass through this particular pathway and though it looked like a path to a different world.